Miller, in the Circuit Court of Camden, when the case of Lida B Delaney against Thomas J. Husband, in action on contract, is called. It is the old story of a broken promise to marry, but the interesting features are probably original with the actors.

When Miss Delaney was 17 years old she entered the employ of the defendant's father, at his laboratory, Third and Spruce streets, Philadelphia. Young Husband found Miss Delaney more attractive than other girls, and told her so. They became engaged, so the story goes, but, upon Husband's suggestion, agreed that the marriage hould not occur until the senior Husband died. The plaintiff might have

On the 15th of each February tle engagement anniversary was celebrated by Husband and Miss Delaney. It was to them the best day in the year; it beat Christmas and Fourth of July out of sight. Of course Miss Delaney was sorry that the elder Husband, her em ployer, should die, but she was consoled by the thought of her approaching marriage. She began to collect a trous-eau. Then came the sad awakening. Another woman appeared upon the scene. Investigation proved that she
